

Serving Women across their Lifespan

JSI in the United States

JSI strives to enhance the health and well-being of women throughout their lifespan.

We work to prevent illness and disease that impact women and improve access to and quality of health care. We do this through focusing on health services delivery systems accessed by women, including primary care providers, reproductive health providers, and perinatal care providers and through focusing on health issues important to women, such as family planning; drug, alcohol, and tobacco use; sexually transmitted diseases, including HIV/AIDS; maternal and child health; nutrition; domestic violence; mental health; and prenatal care.

Developing Provider Capacity to Address Women's Health Issues

Training and Technical Assistance – Working closely with providers and organizations that serve vulnerable and hard-to-reach populations to enhance skills to competently serve women and their partners

Service Integration – Working with providers, organizations, and communities to comprehensively address women's health issues, including family planning, substance use, sexual health, domestic violence and mental health

Determining Critical Success Factors of Programs Serving Women

Program Evaluation – Determining effectiveness of women's health prevention and service delivery programs, including those in the areas of prenatal care, pregnancy prevention, breast and cervical cancer, maternal and child health, managed care, and family planning

Program Monitoring and Tracking – Developing HIPAA-compliant information systems to track program utilization and outcomes
